The potential of nanoparticulate dosage forms to efficiently deliver molecules into the body is based on the large surface of the particles and thereby on their capacity to rapidly diffuse into the body at the site of release. Nanocapsules may be used to administer therapeutic agents such as drugs or pharmaceutically active compounds. There are many challenges in producing solid nanoparticulate formulations. For example, the methods commonly used to prepare nanoparticulate formulations, such as emulsification and ultrasonication, often lead to particle aggregation. This may result in increased clearance of the particles from the body. In addition, the methods used for preparation of the nanoparticulate formulation have to provide a high loading efficiency (typically more than 50%). Finally, the methods for preparation of the nanoparticulate formulation often are not cost-effective. Therefore, there is a need for an improved method to prepare solid nanoparticulate formulations that are of good yield and of high quality, which are not subject to increased clearance of the nanoparticulate formulation from the body after administration. -LS.
